The Drawing Board

Each month a different member of the CWA Board of Directors has the opportunity to write an art-related article for our members.

The Artist Behind African Hall: Frank Tose and the Art of the Diorama by Joe Tringali

For many years, one of my favorite places to visit in San Francisco has been the California Academy of Sciences. I have walked through African Hall countless times, and I have always been struck by the remarkable dioramas: life-size lions, antelope, zebras, cheetahs, and other African wildlife set into carefully constructed landscapes. But on a recent visit, I saw them differently.

The animals are certainly impressive, but the landscape behind them caught my attention. The distant hills, trees, sky, clouds, and subtle color changes are not photographs. They are paintings—large panoramic landscape works carefully designed to make the three-dimensional exhibit appear to continue into the distance. That led me to wonder: Who painted them? The answer is a fascinating story about an artist whose work has been largely hidden in plain sight for nearly a century.

Frank Tose

The artist was Frank Tose, an English-born naturalist, taxidermist, museum preparator, and painter who became an important member of the California Academy of Sciences.

Tose was born in Whitby, England, in 1884 and came to San Francisco in the early 1920s. He joined the Academy's staff and eventually became its head of exhibits. Biographical records say he made several trips to Africa to collect specimens for the Academy's African Hall. He also painted and exhibited smaller works, particularly birds, wildlife, and landscapes. He died in San Francisco in 1944.

He was more than a muralist brought in to decorate exhibits; he was a museum artist in the fullest sense. The Academy's account of its famous lion diorama credits him with every aspect of the display, from the taxidermy and installation to the background mural—a remarkable breadth of responsibility for one artist.

His son, Cecil, followed in his footsteps as a museum preparator and worked alongside him. After Frank's death, Cecil remained at the Academy and eventually became head of its exhibit department. Together, the Toses helped shape the Academy's exhibitions for decades.

Building an African Landscape

African Hall opened in 1934, when international travel was far less common than it is today. For most visitors, Africa was an almost unimaginably distant place. The Academy's solution was to bring Africa to San Francisco.

The dioramas combined preserved animals with artificial terrain, real and artificial plants, rocks and other foreground elements, and enormous painted landscapes. The objective was not simply to display a specimen. It was to create the illusion that the visitor was looking through a window into an actual African habitat. The Academy's records reveal just how carefully these scenes were planned.

A 1929 photograph in the Academy's collection shows a scale model of its famous lion diorama, created five years before African Hall opened. These models gave designers a chance to refine the composition before building the full-size habitat. The finished display differed notably: the lions faced the opposite direction, and a second female was added. This gives us a glimpse of Tose not simply as a painter or taxidermist, but as a designer of visual experiences.

Community Outreach — Oakland Veterans

Glazed Landscapes and Wild Geese by Sheila Cain

The migrating birds may have flown south, but the Oakland vets gathered to paint landscapes with geese. We drew inspiration from Wild Goose Qi Gong, a traditional Chinese practice that combines movement, breathing, and focused attention, inspired in part by the natural movements of wild geese. We wondered: Could we bring that same energy to our painting?

Michael Friedland led the class, demonstrating the art of glazing in several carefully sequenced steps. Our only pencil line was the horizon. Using a mop or other large brush, we mixed a generous puddle of watery lemon yellow and painted overlapping strokes from the top of the paper downward in a graded wash.

Then came a lesson in patience: letting the paper dry. For a successful glaze, the previous layer must be thoroughly dry before you apply the next. A shiny surface is a sure sign that the paper is still wet; even without a sheen, it may need more time. Rushing this step can cause the colors to mix rather than form the transparent layers we wanted.

Once the yellow wash was dry, we repeated the process with watery yellow ochre. After drying the paper again, we brushed on a transparent glaze of water and a touch of alizarin crimson. And there it was—our luminous sky, built layer by transparent layer. Time to let it dry once more!

Next came the foreground fields. Michael showed us how to mix green from ultramarine blue and yellow ochre. We painted diagonal strokes across the lower portion of the paper, adding splatters of water and pigment for texture. While the paint was still slightly damp, we introduced earth tones. Finally, we painted the mountains rising toward the sky.

Michael had guided us through the glazes, and apparently, as far as he was concerned, his job was done.

"What comes next?" we asked.

"Just add the geese," he replied.

We looked at one another. "Just add the geese?"

Michael's goal had been to teach us glazing, and we were thrilled with the results. But the geese were the focal point of the composition. We certainly didn't want our carefully glazed landscapes to end up with a gaggle of misshapen birds that no one could identify.

We consulted our handout and began practicing. Peering over Michael's shoulder, we noticed that his geese were arranged in the familiar V-shaped flying formation—but they were tiny. Very tiny. We could barely see them!

We practiced on a test sheet, took a deep breath, and launched our geese into the sky—some more successfully than others.

Looking at all our paintings together, I was struck by the variety of landscapes, particularly the skies. We had followed Michael's glazing instructions and achieved luminous colors that seemed to glow from within. Painting the geese loosely while keeping them anatomically convincing, however, was asking a lot. We did the best we could.

Perhaps our paintings revealed something about who we are: our individual ways of seeing, the rhythm of our brushstrokes, and even our own chi—the vital energy we had set out to explore through painting, much as we might through Qi Gong.

The reason we paint is more important than what or how we paint. Thomas W. Schaller's work explores contrasts: light and dark, vertical and horizontal, warm and cool, and the real and the imagined. The Drawing Board

The Paintings are Part of the Illusion

The most easily overlooked part of a diorama is often the painted background. Stand in front of one of the African Hall scenes and look carefully at the transition between the physical foreground and the painted landscape. The foreground animals and vegetation occupy real three-dimensional space. Behind them, the terrain gradually disappears into a painted horizon. The effect depends upon careful observation of nature.

Distant mountains must appear softer and less distinct than nearby trees. As forms recede, their colors grow lighter and often cooler. The horizon must align with the viewer's eye, while the shadows and highlights must match the foreground lighting. The painting must never call attention to itself as a painting. Its job is to make us forget that it is there.

Museum historians have recognized Tose as part of a generation of artists who moved between taxidermy and landscape painting. A scholarly study of museum diorama art identifies Tose among the important background painters who began their museum careers as taxidermists. That combination of scientific observation and artistic ability was central to the success of the great natural-history dioramas of the early twentieth century.

What Happened to the Original Paintings?

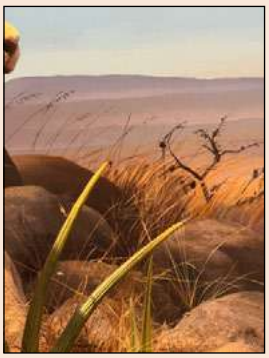

Here the story takes an unfortunate turn. The original African Hall dioramas remained largely unchanged for seven decades. When the Academy's original buildings closed and were later demolished, the painted backgrounds could not simply be removed and stored. They had been painted directly onto the walls. As a result, the original murals were lost when the old building was demolished. The outer two limestone walls of the original African Hall were preserved and incorporated into the new building. The Academy went to considerable lengths to preserve the appearance of Tose's work. The murals were carefully documented, color-matched, and recreated in the new building. The lions themselves were sent to a taxidermist for cleaning and repair, while the original foreground was preserved and recreated.

The new Academy opened in 2008. Interestingly, the outer two limestone walls of the original African Hall were preserved and incorporated into the new building—the only structures from the old Academy that remain. Today, visitors can see 12 recreated dioramas from the original African Hall, along with nine new ones.

So when we stand before those scenes today, we are not looking at the actual 1930s paint on the walls. We are looking at carefully recreated versions of Tose's original environments, based upon extensive documentation.

An Artist Hiding In Plain Sight

What I find most remarkable about Frank Tose is that he seems to have occupied an unusual place between art and science. He was an artist whose paintings were never intended to be viewed simply as paintings. They were part of something larger. His work had to satisfy the scientist's demand for accuracy, the taxidermist's understanding of animal anatomy, and the artist's understanding of composition, color, light and perspective.

The result was something modern museums rarely attempt: an enormous work of landscape painting whose greatest achievement is that the visitor doesn't notice it is a painting. As a result, Tose's name has often been overshadowed by the animals he helped bring to life. Perhaps that is appropriate in one sense. The whole purpose of a natural-history diorama was to make the visitor feel that the animals were the stars.

The next time you visit African Hall, it may be worth spending a few minutes looking past the lions, zebras and antelope. Look at the hills, the horizon, at the way the colors fade into the distance. Behind those animals was an English-born San Francisco artist who traveled to Africa, studied its landscapes and wildlife, and transformed what he saw into vast painted worlds.

Frank Tose may have been one of the Academy's least visible artists, but his work has been in plain sight for generations of visitors. For anyone drawn to both natural history and landscape painting, that may be the most fascinating part of his story—and a fitting way to appreciate Frank Tose's remarkable work.
