The Drawing Board

Each month a different member of the CWA Board of Directors has the opportunity to write an art-related article for our members.

Let Go of What It Is! by Leslie Wilson

I have been teaching watercolor painting classes for years, and I'm always trying to make the drawing and painting process simpler for my students and me. I try to shift my students' thoughts about "what the subject is" (the figure, the face, the mountain, the waves, the rocks, the buildings, the flowers, etc.) to interpretations using the "elements of design" (line, shape, value, color, texture, and changes in direction, as well as soft and hard edges).

This process relaxes me in my own painting, and some of my students have told me that this mental shift reduces pressure and helps them focus on shapes and values rather than identifying and trying to replicate specific objects. Trying to "copy" everything that's there is also mentally taxing, and people get discouraged and frustrated instead of delighting in the process of creating art.

Recently, one of my students repeated my sentiment, "Let Go of What It Is!" and that's how I arrived at the title of this article.

I often focus on the "values" of "shapes" and "changes in direction" to organize the composition, which is accomplished in the drawing stage. With my pencil, I use dark lines for areas of contrast and light lines (or none at all) for areas with less emphasis. This process is like "taking a trip" through the composition like a fly on the wall, discovering areas that attract me, and playing down others. This process offers immediate satisfaction instead of the frustration that can come from "copying" everything from the source reference.

Once I finish the drawing, the process continues with additional development of the composition during the painting process. Again, I consider how I'll apply the elements of design, such as adding texture (in the form of spatter), incorporating areas of rest to balance areas of activity, using warm and cool colors, and deciding which areas to emphasize while leaving others with less detail. Hard edges create interest, while soft edges allow the viewer to rest. As you develop a painting, trust your judgment and don't worry about perfection.

And if a painting doesn't work: well, "so what!!!" I sincerely believe that if you adopt this new way of thinking through the painting process, it is much more fun!

All of these considerations help create a mood or story, which I hope keeps viewers of my paintings engaged.

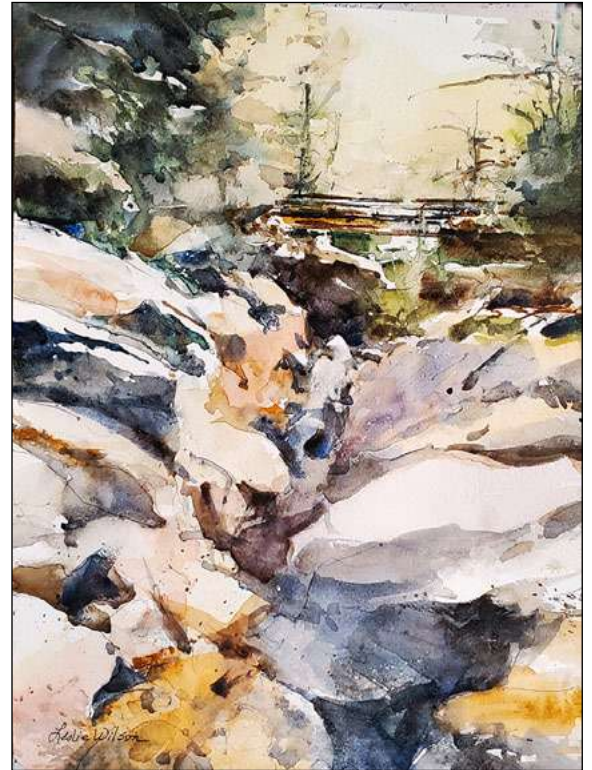

I've attached two of my recent paintings, Sculptured Rocks, and Roses, which I believe show that, for me, painting isn't about perfection, but about constantly evaluating which decisions improve the design.

Here's to happy painting!

Compositional Designs for Realistic and Abstract Art and 9/11 by Sheila Cain

On September 11, 2026, the Oakland veterans group gathered with CWA volunteers to continue working on their 6 x 6 inch realistic and abstract mini-paintings. It was, of course, the anniversary of 9/11. We shared memories, reflections, and even some of the conspiracy theories surrounding that day. It felt as though we had been given a place to express our feelings about 9/11—a very healing experience.

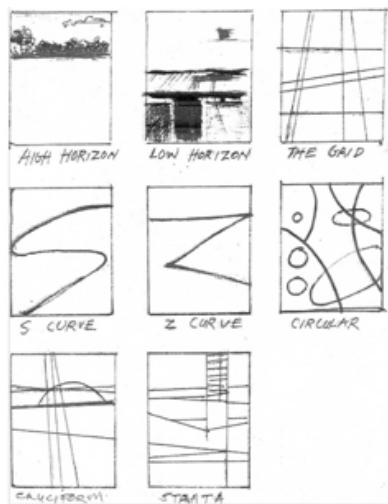

At the same time, we continued working on our series of small paintings, adding here and wiping out there, especially when working on Yupo.

Pat Moseuk brought printouts illustrating Composition Designs for Abstract and Representational Art, including high horizon, low horizon, grid, “S” curve, strata, and others. She also brought realistic images that used these compositional designs. Seeing the designs applied to realistic paintings was very convincing and helped demonstrate how effective they can be. What a great lesson! We were challenged to choose one of these compositional designs and use it as the basis for a painting. Alternatively, we could paint as we normally would and then, when finished, identify which compositional design we had used.

COMPOSITION DESIGNS FOR ABSTRACT AND REPRESENTATIONAL ART

It was a fun and engaging class. Sheila brought Art Graf pigment compressed into the shape of tailor's chalk and showed us how to use it. It was a hit! We continued working on our small paintings (about 6 x 6 inches) and enjoyed using YUPO and 140 lb. Arches.

The conversation flowed so easily that we plan to go to lunch next month after our painting session.

September at the Martinez VA

Today, our artists felt inspired to sketch, so we borrowed some seasonal décor to create a still-life composition. Three artists—although one had not yet arrived when the photo was taken—created three unique interpretations, while the usual observers watched without committing. Each artist brought a distinct painting style to the composition.

Thomas W. Schaller The Power of Design and Imagination

LIVE

The reason we paint is more important than what or how we paint. Thomas W. Schaller's work explores contrasts: light and dark, vertical and horizontal, warm and cool, and the real and the imagined. He enjoys designing with conflicting elements, allowing them to find balance and resolution on the paper's surface in surprising and expressive ways.

September Demo Recap — Michael Reardon

by Lis MacDonald

Michael captivated the audience with a watercolor demonstration that transformed a quiet street scene in Assisi into a study of light, shadow, and atmosphere. He began by converting his reference image to black and white, using it to create a value study that served as the roadmap for the painting. From there, he washed the sky in cobalt blue, gradually warming the color to orange near the horizon. He then built depth with the shadow shapes of doors, windows, and eaves, mixing darker values of ultramarine blue, quinacridone burnt orange, and burnt sienna light. Once the washes had dried, he added texture to the sunlit buildings and placed rich darks along the opposite side of the street, bringing the scene into sharper focus. Final details were added at the end.
